XtraFinder Crack.Q: How do you tell a story and make use of its parts? How do you decide how to organize parts when you have a story? I have read a lot of novels, and all of them have the same structure - they begin with the protagonist's first meeting the main character of the story (or even in a dream), and they end with the protagonist meeting the main character. Usually some sort of reconciliation happens, or the main character is eventually understood or something like that. I have seen this structure being used in films and television as well, and I've seen quite a few original stories which use this structure as well, both of the long form and the short. So far I haven't seen anything that breaks this structure. I do not mean that this is the only way to structure a novel (think of the multi-generational saga, or War and Peace, for example). Given this structure, how do you decide what to put in the beginning and what to put in the end? I would say that you need to decide first, who the protagonist is, and then you need to decide if you want the story to be a romance or action or comedy or tragedy or science fiction or fantasy or whatever. But I wonder if there is some kind of way of deciding before you write the first word and without first knowing who the protagonist is? I am very interested in how other writers organize their books. A: There are some writers who prefer to write a complete draft first, with a specific ending, without knowing the ending until they've done the first draft. That's definitely my preferred method. (Although I do know the ending before I start writing.) The other method is to write a general outline first, with a tentative ending, and then once you've completed that first draft, come back to the sketch and see where the characters are going, and where the climax should take place. For a long fantasy novel, there's a 50/50 split
